Mostly German synagogues but also includes photographs of a synagogue in South Bend, Indiana and the Jeschurun Synagogue Jerusalem. Original wrapps., 21cm, 31 pp, very good condition. Jews lived in Stuttgart as early as the Middle Ages. What is now Stuttgart's Brennerstrasse, was called the "Judengasse" (Jew Alley) in medieval times. Jewish communities were re-established in the 19th century; with a population of nearly 5,000 around 1931, Stuttgart developed quickly into Wuerttemberg's largest Jewish settlement. Nearby Bad Cannstatt had almost 500 Jewish residents at the turn of the century (1900). There are four Jewish cemeteries: part of the Hoppenlau cemetery (in use between 1834 and 1873), part of the Prag cemetery (since 1873 and still in service), a section of the Steinhaldensfeld cemetery (now Zentralfriedhof, used since 1944) and a segment of the Steig cemetery in Bad Cannstatt (Jewish cemetery of the Cannstatt community since 1872-73). None of the synagogues, all built in the 19th century, escaped Nazi destruction in 1938. The current Stuttgart synagogue at Hospitalstrasse 36, erected in 1952 on the site of the former Synagogue, is adjacent to the Jewish community center of the "Israelite Religious Community in Wuerttemberg". It has 2,600 members (as of 2003). The city is studded with reminders of the former Jewish community and its prominent members; among others, the memorial to Otto Hirsch on the Otto-Hirsch-bridges above Stuttgart's harbour. The Jewish section of the Prag cemetery contains a monument to the 2,498 Jewish citizens of Wuerttemberg murdered between 1933 and 1945.*
